GRANTS, FELLOWSHIPS, AWARDS, AND PRIZES

- 1) Austrian Science Fund (FWF) research grant P30084 (2017-2022)
 - Project Title: Superseding Historical Injustice and Changed Circumstances
 - Project Co-leaders: Lukas Meyer (University of Graz), Timothy Waligore (Pace University)
 - Funded doctoral and graduate students at the University of Graz (Austria), science to public education, and international conferences and workshops, which formed basis for edited volumes and special journal issues. The inaugural workshop on “The Temporal Orientation of Justice” was held in June 2018 at the University of Graz. This formed the basis for a special journal issue published in Critical Review for International Social and Political Philosophy and later published as an edited book by Routledge). The final project workshop on “Justice and Time” was held in May 2022, which formed the basis for a 2024 special journal issue in Res Publica (the guest-editor earned a Ph.D. funded through this grant).
 - Abstract: On what grounds should justice be concerned about past injustice? If a group or individual was damaged through past injustice, but is now well-off, should justice be concerned to redress a past injustice, or should justice look forward and be concerned only with present disadvantage? When is a forward-looking orientation best, when is a backward-looking orientation best, and when should we transition between the two? To answer these questions, we look to analyze and critically develop the thesis that historical injustice can be superseded. A possible example of supersession is this: if it were unjust for settlers to seize indigenous lands in 1865, changes in circumstances, such as population increases and environmental conditions, might make it unjust in 2018 to simply return the land and resources originally taken. The ‘supersession thesis’ (named by legal and political theorist Jeremy Waldron) has become extremely influential among theorists both skeptical and supportive of reparations for past injustice. What are different possible versions of the supersession thesis? How might its theoretical structure be further analyzed, criticized, and developed? Which changes in circumstances matter? Four different types of possible supersession will be examined, relating to (1) property, (2) attachment to land in the sense of mass expulsion, genocide, and settlement, (3) group identity, and/or (4) sovereignty.
